*Arthur Corbin, President & CEO
Municipal Gas Authority of Georgia*

“Electrification” originated in the 1930s when Congress created programs and incentives to bring electric service to people living in rural and remote areas. Today, the term has been hijacked by the electric industry to justify and promote fuel switching to build load, and by those who wish to eliminate the use of fossil fuels. What can we do in the face of this growing electrification movement to make sure natural gas continues to be a viable energy option for consumers?

The Slow Pace of Big Change: The Future of Energy Systems

In recent years, the energy sector has absorbed a wave of hype and hope around visions of new innovations and disruptions to the industry. Some visions continue to hold real potential while others seem to be falling victim to mismanaged promises and expectations. In this session we will learn how Futurists approach the uncertainty of long term, era-based industry transitions. We will explore changes ahead in the energy sector and also around the changing nature of work.

Security

*Steve Snyder, Senior Attorney

In this age in which we are critically dependent on data of all sorts and everything in interconnected, it is time to dispel the distinction between cyber and overall security. This presentation will focus on reworking the notion of compartmentalizing cybersecurity and instead recognizing it for the pervasive issue it has become. Learn where to start and how to go about rounding out your organization's security by properly considering cyber along with more traditional security.
